True Peace: The Presence of Justice
True peace is not merely the absence of war; it is the presence of justice. — Jane Addams

True Peace: the Presence of Justice

What constitutes true peace?

Jane Addams was at the forefront of the women’s international peace movement. In a radical and transformative act, she traveled in 1915 along with over 1000 women to the Hague in the Netherlands to oppose World War I for the first International Women’s Congress.

Women from enemy nations united at the Hague Congress in an unprecedented effort to demand peace. They issued a series of 20 resolutions urging governments to employ mediation. Deliberations of women bravely moved through war-ravaged areas in Europe to persuade officials to learn more about what was happening in the war and to report on war not being covered by the media. Their hope was to expose and eliminate the causes of war.

After World War I ended in 1918, delegates formed the Women’s International League of Peace and Freedom (WILPF). Founder of the Women’s Peace Party, Jane Addams served as the first President of WILPF until 1929 and presided over six of the organization’s international conferences.

WILPF members denounced the worldwide notion of the patriarchal nation-state and the nationalistic view that actively fueled war. They believed that peace would never be achieved without social, economic and gender justice. They sought peace in the form of democracy, decolonization, women’s rights, human rights, and civil rights.

What does international women’s peace organizing look like today?

Artist-activists, Sarah Ji and Monica Trinidad share their photographs and print work that documents Chicago activism around a range of nationally recognized causes within the past ten years. They have created art for and from the many civil and human rights campaigns in which they participated, including anti-militarization of the police and police brutality, education justice, mental health advocacy, prison abolition, trans and gender non-conforming liberation, the struggle for Black Lives, Indigenous land rights, immigration rights and many more. Their work demonstrates that most grassroots struggles in Chicago continue to be led and engineered by the organizing efforts of women and queer communities of color, and that the contemporary fight for peace is rooted in the fight for racial, economic and gender justice.
